Postoffice Notice.

FOUND UNCONSCIOUS BY HER HUSBAND.

Mrs. Christina Bush, of No. 139 Lafayette-st., Paterson, is recovering from the effects of some rough usage which she received on Saturday night at the hands of a robber. Her husband was away at the time. She was sitting in the kitchen of their home awaiting his return. About half-past 10 a man entered the room, and, before Mrs. Bush could raise a cry to summon assistance, the man placed his hand across her mouth to prevent her crying out. The man wore a mask over his face. He threw Mrs. Bush to the floor and, despite her struggles, bound her hands and feet and inserted a piece of cloth, which he took from a table, into stamps. The robbery was from the vault in the private office of Postmaster Curren. This office is entered by a heavy door from the corrider. It is separated from the office of the stamp clerk by a brick wall. The postoffice is at River and Lewis sts., in the busiest part of the city. Mr. Curren left the office about 4 o'clock. He intended to return after his luncheon. He locked the inner compartment of the vault by closing the steel door, and turning the key, he says. He did not lock the outer door, which locks with a combination. The key to the inner compartment was on Mr. Curren's keyring. He was in the habit of leaving the vaul are times in the course of his trips when he can not see the entrance to the postmaster's room. No one was seen to enter or leave the room after Mr. Curren left it, a little after 4 o'clock. The watchman says he saw no one standing about the corridor. The stamps were in the vault only a short time before Mr. Curren left the place, as he short time before Mr. Curren left the place, as he gave out a lot to the clerks at the stamp window.

Mr. Curren returned to the postoffice about 4:55 o'clock. He stood for a couple of minutes talking to a friend in the corridor, and near his own door. On entering the office he had occasion to go to the vault. On pulling open the big door he found that the inner one stood partly open. This attracted his attention at once, as the remembered having looked it when he went open. This attracted his attention at once, as he remembered having locked it when he went out. He at once opened the compariment, and found it empty, with the exception of some papers of no value. Chief of Police Donovan, of Hoboken, was informed at once by telephone, and with Inspector Lewis hurried to the office. A careful examination of the yault was made and

HE DECLARES THAT HIS YOUNG DAUGHTER IS OF UNSOUND MIND AND IS IMMORAL.

Police Court yesterday afternoon on a warrant issued at the instance of her father, charging her with being of unsound mind and of gross immorality. The prisoner is a bright, vivacious girl, twenty years old. She is the daughter of Charles G. andborg, of No. 213 West One-hundred-and-thirtyfifth-st., the marine architect. Her name is Helen Lundborg appeared against his daughter. His wife was with him. He said that the prisoner was born in Sweden about twenty years ago. Early in life she developed symptoms of hip disease, and the family travelled all over Europe, visiting and con-sulting the best physicians on the Continent as to the best treatment for their daughter. Helen was an accomplished linguist, speaking six languages no means to make the girl's life bright and happy, hoping thus to relieve her distress of mind because of her deformity. About June last they emscribed the daughter's peculiar actions, and they Lundborgs have a summer home at Atlantic went, taking Kate Newell with them. Mr. Lund gave the servant her discharge. When Helen learned of this, she declared she would leave the house, too, if Kate went. So the Lundborgs kept the woman. Returning to this city, Kate was sent away. Both the girls left the house that night, about four weeks, when she was discovered living in a miserable, cramped, furnished apartment on the West Side, not far from the centre of the Tender loin District. She was discovered through a Mr. Cummings, a lawyer whom Helen had employed on some trivial matter. He wrote to Mr. Lundborg He wrote to Mr. Lundborg was that the sooner he removed his daughter from the noticed that she acted strangely. She used to stand in the middle of the floor and draw imaginary circles around her. Then, too, at times she was very violent, and had to be watched lest she should do

After remaining home a week Helen eluded the vigilance of her parents, and again sought her friend Kate. For four weeks the Landborgs searched high and low for the missing girl, employing private detectives. About a week ago she was found in company with Kate in a furnished-room house kept by a Mrs. Faulkner at No. 234 West Thirty-minth-st., and detectives were detailed to watch their movements. As a result, Mr. Lundborg charges his daughter with associating with people of immoral character, and that she is of unsound mind, and had a warrant issued yesterday. Helen was arrested by Court Officer Stetter, of the Harlem Police Court.

When she was made acquainted with the charges made against her, the girl indignantly declared that they were absolutely untrue, and that they were absolutely untrue, and that they were the result of persecution on the part of her father. "How have you supported yourself since leaving home?" asked E. A. Scott, who appeared for the Lundborgs.

"I have lived on Kate's savings and a private home?" asked E. A. Scott, who appeared for the Lundborgs.

"I have lived on Kate's savings and a private ionn" Helen retorted.
She refused to say where she had made the loan, and Justice Burke committed her to Bellevue Hospital to be examined as to her sanity.

The Newell woman was in ccurt. She is a tall, dark, unprepossessing woman, masculine of feature and is deeply marked from smallpox.

The charges grew out of a murder case in which Desmand was interested. It was alleged at the time that Desmond paid Mr. Downing a considerable sum of money to aid in running down the murderers. Desmond subsequently preferred charges against Mr. Downing for having taken the money, which was in the form of a check. Congressman James W. Covert defended Downing. While the charges were pending he was nominated State Senator. He was removed from office immediately after his nomination.

"I was very much surprised on reading the statement," said President Califanan, "outlining a plan for a committee of Club F, with John Brooks Leavitt at its head, to institute proceedings or to ask the Attorney-General to institute proceedings to annul the Tammany Society's charter. The first that we heard about the matter was when Mr. Leavitt atluded to it at the dinner on Saturday evening. No action was taken on the matter, no committee was appointed nor was one asked for. Please say for Club F that no action will be taken on any important matter until it is carefully considered at a meeting called for the purpose of considering the question. But all the pleas to Providence—of which there was a great number—were so fervent, and all the imprecations—which also abounded—were so energetic, that it would have been strange if the audience had not been profoundly stirred. The acting of Eben Piympton as Jack Osborne, the Cotton King, was robust and determined.

The Cotton King suffered almost as much anguish as if he had been operating in cotton on the Liverpool market for a towering rise in prices in this year of a huse crop and of vast hordes of feroclous bears, but peace and plenty and a loving bride were his at last. Dominick Murray was effective and interesting in the part of James Shellinglow, an engine-driver, and Dan Collyer, formerly of Harrigan's company, diverted the saliery to a considerable extent. Miss Ameia Summerville had a part which was apt and suitable for her, and she made the most of it. Miss May Wheeler, as the heroine, Kitty Drayson, was zealone and intense in all she did, and all she said. Miss Bijou Fernandez, in a small part, acted creditably. Empire Theatre, where it was produced last night.

Mr. Jones, a man of marked ability and high character, has written good things, but "The Masquerders" is not one of them, and kindness dictates that it should be dismissed with but a few words. Viewed it should be dismissed with but a few words. Viewed as a piece of mechanism, the play is theatrically effective, and, if that were all, it would be commendable; but theatrical effect is paltry, and not ressive, when, in what purports to be a picture ife, it is obtained at the sacrifice of reason. In The Masqueraders" character is distorted, operation of human passion is misrepresented, and society is caricatured. The persons introduced into t are supposititious, and, even at that, are irrational it are suppositious, and, even at that, are irrational and ill-bred. Much of the language,—more especially in the second act.—is the flippant frippery of artificial cynicism. The implied thought, if thought it can be called, is merely the truism that vanity and inches are fruitful courses. can be called and fruitful causes of misery; and the total result is a useless pother about one of the total resus and humiliating of all human infirmi-ties, namely, the amatory infatuation that is possible 25 a consequence of animal propensity, in v ded persons. Few things so essentially juvenile n presented apon the stage in our day, and act that Mr. George Alexander, who has for time been acting in it, should suddenly have afflicted with the measles will cause no sur-The wonder is that such a piece should not

The former was rich; the latter poor. One of Duicie's kisses was offered for sale at auction, in the hotel yard, in presence of the gentry of the neighborhood (who, of course, would be present at such a scene—they always are), and, after a spirited competition between Skene and Remon, was knocked down to Skene, who then made to the girl an offer she said, desirous to shine in London live happily or even comfortably together, and David Remon, who had inherited a fortune, afforded them liberal pecuniary aid, and constituted himself a sort of guardian angel of Lady Skene,—considerably averting his gaze from the heavenly bodies, for that purpose. At last Sir Skene grossly insulted his two men quarrelled; and, in a game at with that lady and her child for the stake David Remon won them from the husband and father, and conveyed them away. Lady Skene sister, however, intimated to David that it would be improper for him to dwell in adultery with another man's wife, and David thereupon emigrated to the coast of Africa. That is the play,-an exposition, by means of preposterous incidents, of a case of matrimonial infelicity, consequent upon the marriage of a simpleton to a blackguard, and the amatery disappointment of a foot. People who can derive any benefit, of any kind, from stuff of that sort must be easily satisfied in the matter of mental sustenance.

amatory disappointment of a fool. People who can derive any benefit, of any kind, from stuff of that part must be easily satisfied in the matter of mental sustenance.

At the St. James, in London, the princhal parts in 'The Masqueraders.'—so called because its persons are supposed, in their conduct of life, to wear masks and to display themselves in fictitious guises,—were acted by Mr. George Alexander, Mr. Herbert Waring and Mrs. Patrick Campbell. The best performance was that of Mr. Waring, who, having a monstrosity to represent, solved the difficulty by making Skene a showy brute. Mrs. Campbell, an amateur actress, of very slender ability, assumed in Dulcle a state of sentimental frenzy of the old body-swaying, chin-quivering and furiously loquacious pattern, and she was excessively tiresome in it. Mr. Alexander invested the markish hero. Remon, with grace and intermittent impetuosity. At the Empire Theatre Remon was played by Henry Miller, Skene by William Faversham, and Dulcle by Viola Alien—manifestly a good cast. Neither of those simply conventional actors, however, taken at their best, are stimulative of anxious thought, and it was easily possible to view their proceedings with tranquility. Miss Viola Alien,—handsome, earnest, and sweet of voice,—created a ripple of transient interest, by her vehement delivery of Lady Skene's hysterical speech on marriage, and the card-duel was duly effective, as managed by Mr. Miller and Mr. Faversham—the latter of whom showed more mind than there is room for in the whole of Skene's anatomy. The effect would have been yet stronger if the three players had been of a more sensitive order or in a more sympathetic mood. Miss Viola Alien handsome, earnest, and the card-duel was duly effective, as managed by Mr. Miller and Mr. Faversham, forgetting, apparently, that intensity is more potent than violence, grew loud have been yet stronger if the three players had been of a more sensitive order or in a more sympaphetic mood. made them seem pungent to the hearer. This they are not—for the author is really a man of kind heart and benevolent mind, and is no more capable of writing with vitriel than the late Martin Tupper was. The remarks on marriage, together with diverse other observations in the course of the play, denote Mr. Jones in his most didactic vein. It is strong preaching, but it is not apt drama; and surely it seems a pity that this able dramatist cannot practically discard the delusion that he has been called upon to reform society and regulate the morals of mankind. One result, however, must eventually ensue from the redundancy of these preachy plays—that the public will sicken of them and will welcome in the romantic drama. Baxters Call has been heard, and the Ten Commandments are getting to be pretty well known. The audience was large, and it seemed to recognize the "sensation" character of the play. That sensation character may possibly insure for it a considerable run. With one class of our vast public, "who peppers the highest is surest to please." STAR THEATRE - MISS ROSE COGHLAN. The reappearance of Miss Rose Coghlan on the mage where she gained a great part of her popularlty is a pleasant incident and a subject of congratulty is a pleasant incident and a subject of congratu-lation. Unhappily, the same cannot be said of her Pay. She was seen at the Star Theatre last night in a work by Mrs. Romualdo Pacheco, entitled, "To Nemess, or Love and Hate." There must be some-thing wrong with the market when such an artist as Miss Coghlan is obliged to accept such a play as this. It is useless to try to soften or palliate the verdict. The play is not interesting. With that great fault it is of little account if the construction correct or the dialogue carefully written. The spectator does not feel moved with sympathy for heroine. Nothing entitles her to special conelderation, except that long ago, before the play be gan, she was deceived and wronged. Neither is any great hatred of the viliain aroused. He is not gan, she was deceived and wronged. Neither is any great haired of the viliain aroused. He is not seen to do anything objectionable. He did once, the audience is told, but it is permitted to observe only his punishment. Perhaps it is better not to dislike him hastily, for it proves in the end that he is not really the viliain at all, but only his twin brother. Sorrow for suffering and wrong is a worthy emotion, but the stage would promote more happiness if the woman with a past could be led to yield a little space on it to the woman with a future. Her hopes will give more pleasure than her sad sister's despair. A burst of happiness at the end does not compensate the audience for all that it has gone through at the beginning.

Such gratification as was to be found in the performance of last night was due to Miss Coghan's infusion of her own personality into the unstaclous part which she played. Her free and vigorous action and her command of the situation were worth seeing, and worth noting. Her strong will and her firm grasp of her own purpose saved more than one moment that would otherwise have been dull and commonplace. She had the assistance of an able company. Such actors as Mme. von Trautman, Miss Hattle Russell, Miss Effic Shannon, Cecil M. York and J. W. Shannon could have done a good play and done it well. The efforts of all these were well directed and commendable, and should not be wasted on such silly portraitures as they were. Miss Coghlan announces that she has other new plays in preparation, and it is to be hoped that the many admirers of her art will soon have an opportunity to see some of them.

THE COTTON KING" AT THE ACADEMY. There are five acts in "The Cotton King," a melodrama by Sutton Vane, which was seen for the first tirre in this city in the Academy of Music last evening. The fourth act was not begun until 11 o'clock. The chief cause of delay was the figure of the court of the co tayy and messive stage setting for this act, in thich the machinery of a big cotton mill in full certaion is exhibited. At the close of the act the stration is exhibited. At the close of the act the liain of the play attempts to murder the heroine r hurling her beneath the descending freight elector of the mill. Of course, the hero rescued her mid thunders of applause from the delighted East like audience.

A notable night in the annals of Italian opera was that of yesterday, which was given up to a representation of Verdi's "Otello." Under any circumstances it would have been an intellectual and emotional refreshment to renew acquaintance with mates of its artistic merits, is indubitaly one of the most extraordinary products in musical his tory, as an evidence of the vigor and progressive ness of an old man's creative genius. a final judgment upon the genius of Verdi is not yet come; nor will it come until the world has had time fully to pender his last utterance. But those who have been privileged to observe s orks which he has brought forward in the course of the last twenty-five years must realize that the history of music has had few such examples of steady development toward high ideals. In fact the strides from "Ernani" (to overlook the time limit specified for a moment) to "Otello" has only one parallel in modern records at least, and that is found in the progress of Wagner from "Rienzi to "Parsifal." But of the artistic ideals exemplified in "Otello" this journal has frequently spok is sufficient to the present purpose to say that in the light of the earnest work doing by the younger composers of Italy, this opera, written after Verdi had passed the allotment of three score years and ten, has lost none fo its freshness and interest, but remains a marvellous example of how music can heighten their expressiveness.

But if the intentions of the composer are to be fully realized it is necessary that they be interpreted by such artists as performed that beautiful task last night. If Signor Tamagno's performance be dissociated from that of his colleagues it would be incorrect to say that it surpassed his previous efforts. In fact, he has seldom sung so distress-ingly and persistently out of tune as he did last night. But its dramatic forcefulness was brought vividly to the fore by association with M. Maurel. The extent to which these two impersonations supplement each other is altogether worthy of admiring remark. So, too, is the transforming influence of the drama of Bolto and Verdi upon Tamagno individually. Between his Otello and his Edgardo, for instance, there is as great a difference as between the ideals of Donizetti and the later Verdi. Wagner substituted singing actors for mere singers in termany, and with this opera Verdi did the same thing in Italy. Even the mannerisms of Tamagno, so offensive as a rule, acquire meaning and eloquence under the inspiration of Versi's score, while his distinctness of utterance becomes exalted into a most potent virtue. As forr M. Maurel, his lago is certainly one of the most striking operatic creations of the present time. It would even stand comparison in some respects with the lago of Shakespeare if the music did not of necessity retard its action, and limit its intellectual manifestation. As it is, M. Maurel seeks to supply the enforced deficiencies by varied and intelligent byplay, of which much must be said in praise, but also of which more might be said if it were not so plainly addressed to the public. A intelligent byplay, of which much must be said in praise, but also of which more might be said if it were not so plainly addressed to the public. A finer exemplification of dramatic singling in the highest sense than his narration of Cassio's alleged perfuly to Otello cannot be imagined, yet, for the sake of the public, it was addressed to them and not to the Moor. It seems ungracious to say this while under the influence of acting so diversified, so intelligent, emotional and moving as that witnessed last night; but where there is much light there is also shadow, and it cannot detract from M. Maurel's great merits to direct attention to one fault which after all may be said to be due to excessive zeal. There were many scenes of rapturous delight in the course of last night's performance, but no tribute was finer than the promptness with which the audience suppressed every attempt to interrupt the play with applause in the middle of a scene. Even M. Maurel's "Credo" (his first triumph, for his entrance was effected so unobtrusively that he escaped recognition in the first act) was permitted to pass with its effect unmarred by injudicious plaudits.

Mme. Eames-Story's return to the Metropolitan Opera House was signalized by a lovely and deserved demonstration of welcome, which also was postponed till the end of the first act. In this act she suffered from the untunefulness of the tenor, but later she justified the admiration in which she is held by beautiful and effective singing and acting. It was her first appearance here in the character of Desdemona, which, however, she has sung in London.

HEAVY LOSS BY FIRE IN UTICAL SIX-STORY BUSINESS BLOCK DESTROYED-A

DRUG FIRM BURNED OUT. Utica, N. Y., Dec. 3 (Special).-The six-story block, known as the Comstock block and occupled by the wholesale drug firm of Comstock Brothers, burned to-night at midnight. The block was one of the finest in the city, and the loss will reach several hundred thousand dollars. The upper stories were mostly given up to offices. A family living on the top floor escaped over the roof of an adjoining building. A fire in the same block caused a loss of over half a million dollars in 1884. One fireman was severely injured.

OLGA NETHERSOLE APPEARS IN WASHINGTON. Washington, Dec. 3 (Special).—Miss Olga Nether-icle appeared at Albaugh's Theatre to-night in "Camille" before an audience which seemed thor-oughly to appreciate the effort of this talented young Englishwoman to interpret with reserve, but with tremendous feeling, a character whom the mawkish sentimentality of generations has distorted into the outlines of a caricature. Miss Nethersole is known to New-York playgoers, and Nethersole is known to New-York playgoers, and better, perhaps, in "Camille" than in any other play. It is needless, therefore, to say anything touching her art, beyond noting the unqualified success scored by her before a Washington audience, which included the wife of the President, the women of the Cabinet circle, and many other notabilities in official, diplomatic and social circles.

SOROSIS AND EDUCATION.

KNOWLEDGE AS A FACTOR IN THE WORLD'S PROGRESS.

The first meeting of Sorosis since that club became a part of the State Federation was held yesifternoon at Sherry's, with a large numeon and in the interval between that and the lit erary aftermath, congratulations and flew back and forth, and much natural pride was shown over the success of the conference, which was originated and held by Sorosis. The programme for the afternoon was an ex-They included a song by the Sorosis Carol an original recitation by Mrs. Evelyn Baker Harvier, a piano solo by Miss Henriette Seckendorf, recitation by Mrs. Lydia Wood and a song by Mrs. Frederic Dean. Incidental to the disc an additional number was given by Mrs. Elizabeth Starbuck, the president of Nantucket Scrosis, who recited an original poem on Thanksgiving.

The question for discussion was: "Has Education Been the Most Important Factor in the Development of the World and Elevation of the Huma

Mrs. Stella Goodrich Russell, chairman of the Committee on Education, presented the question. In closing, Mrs. Russell said that she cussion which was to follow. The first speaker on the affirmative was Mrs. D. T. S. Dennison, who made of education and science a united factor in the development of the world. 'From every department of science," it was said flows a life-giving stream. Science and education have battled bravely for the eternal truth. Theology has broadened, but education of necessity always has preceded religious knowledge, and its at tendant virtue, morality. Education is our safe-guard, and it is what we must have to annihilate liliteracy and to reduce to a shadow its twin

Miss Agnes Warner, the first speaker in the negative, declared herself to have been almost over-whelmed by the magnitude of her subject, which had been so productive of wakeful hours and a dis-inclination to think of anything else that at length it had taken her to her old college town, and there, in the library of the institution where she had passed many a long day delving for knowledge, she said to be the ruling power of humanity. It was sadded that education was a great blessing, without which men would be but "rudderless ships."

Mrs. Ada M. Hrown also believed education to be a lesser factor in life, and while admitting her belief that the Christian Church had accomplished much harm as well as good, she gave as her opinion that it was "the spirit of altruism, or other-ism, which makes progress possible and the dwellers in this world akin."

A summary of the discussion was given by Mrs. Jennie de la M. Lozier, who declared that education had not been the most important factor in the development of the world and elevation of the human race. She added that the "negatives" had it, and that according to their arguments the positives also were negatives in this case, and so they were all right.

Dr. John Fox, of the Second Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, acted as moderator, and the Rev. Messrs. L. Welsey Welles and A. B. Pretchard were chosen stated clerks. Dr. Talmage was present, and after the meeting opened his letter of resignation was read. It set forth the reasons already published. The Rev. J. F. Carson then presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Presbytery, while yielding to Dr. Talmage's earnest petition for dissolution of the relationship existing between the Brooklyn Tabernacle and himself, expresses the deep regret at the necessity for such action, and wishes Dr. Talmage abundant success in any field in which, in the Providence of God, he may be called to labor. The Presbytery also expresses its profound sympathy with the members of the Tabernacle Church in the loss of their honored and loving pastor, and cordially commends them to go forward in all the work of the church.
